Organ Donation

Organ donation is one of the practises that people need to volunteer, to help save the life of other people that are in need and suffering. It is therefore important that people should voluntarily accept to be among the donor groups by ensuring that they check the part marked "organ donor" on their drivers’ license.

It is important to note that through accepting to be a donor, a person will be offering a gift of life to a patient that is in need (Manninen, & Evans, 1985). When a person passes away, he/she will not need the organs any more. As result of this, individuals should be more willing to give out there organs when dead to facilitate saving the life of people who can survive when the organs are transplanted to them (Abadie, & Gay, 2006).

Also, organ donation is supposed to be practiced since it is allowed by majority of religions. Since religions have viewed organ transplant as a life saving activity, people are not supposed to sit back with their organs waiting to be buried or cremated (Manninen, & Evans, 1985). However, instead they should decide to give out to their fellow individuals suffering and awaiting for them in hospitals.

Furthermore, through donation one can save up to 8 lives and this makes him/her to remain as a legend even after death. When a person decides to donate his functional body parts to other peoples waiting for implantation, the parts can be used to save life of up to 8 people. This shows that the donor will be among the people fighting to reduce of the high amount of deaths that occurs to people waiting for implantation, this one way of remaining a superhero of a country (Abadie, & Gay, 2006).

Therefore, human beings are supposed to help each other in ensuring that life is saved using all the possible means like donation of body parts hence “everyone should check the "organ donor" on his or her driver license.”
References
