Is medicine magic or some sort of voodoo product that transforms one's health from a sick and weak individual to a healthy and strong person that can go about their daily business normally? When I was young, that is what I used to ask myself anytime I was sick. After getting treated and getting my prescription I would feel fine. At that time I was just a child and I could never understand how it all worked. This made me develop an interest in healthcare, and as I grew older I became interested in medicine specifically how it is made and how it works to make sick people healthy again.

While growing up, the hospital and the pharmacy were part of my environment. This is not because I usually fell ill often. Instead, my father was a doctor and worked at the local hospital, and my uncle was a pharmacist at the same hospital. I spent most of my free time at the hospital mostly visiting my father and I loved playing with my uncle during his free time. I began to respect the work they were doing for the community. As I grew older, I befriended my uncle and started helping out with the pharmacy as a messenger. From time to time, I'd get them coffee and tea. This close relationship with both of them had a heavy influence on my choice to study pharmacy since I admired their work, work ethics and most importantly I had started to learn a few things about medicine with my uncle's help.

My family has always been involved in offering healthcare to people who were in need. First, we had a savings account where all the members contributed some funds that would later be donated to various groups, especially the homeless and the elderly. During such occasions, my dad used to treat those who were sick without charging any fee. Together with my uncle, they ensured that they also provided medicine to those patients in-need, as well as offering to cater for further treatment when the situation called for it. This is a practice that we still carry on to-date. As a result, seeing how being a doctor and a pharmacist could make a change in a person's life has always influenced most of my decisions. I want to study medicine so that I can team up with other individuals in the same profession who would want to help people live a better life.

Nothing in life comes easy and for us, and to achieve our dreams we have to strive and work hard for everything we want. This has always been what motivates all my actions. Throughout my education, I ensured that I worked hard and got good grades in order to pursue my dream career. When most of my classmates found science and medicine hard to grasp, for me it was the easiest thing – mainly because I worked hard and found it easy to understand. During my college years, I studied pharmaceutical science and other units related to pharmacology and therapeutics. I learned the roles of a pharmacist in different settings by working in both community and institutional pharmacies. One of my proudest achievements was participating in the development of molecular imaging at the Frangioni Laboratory at Harvard Medical School. My dad was very proud of me. I went on to continue making him proud with my studies. After I graduated, I worked as a full-time pharmacy technician.

I believe my educational background and my professional experience in the field qualifies me to join this institution so that I can expand my knowledge and help improve the quality of the healthcare system for the benefit of the community and the world at large. I am looking forward to earning my diploma at your institution, and I believe you will give me the opportunity to fulfill my dreams.
