Different people have different definitions of success. In order to critically define the real meaning of success – perhaps the first and most significant recognition which any person can make – is that no single defined formula exists which outlines the way to personal success. The statement means that people can do different things in their quest for personal development. Every person has his own goals and priorities, meaning that different attitudes and activities will make people feel good about themselves (Pronovost, Cleeman, Wright, & Srinivasan, 2016). The definition of what success is for every individual should be grounded based upon his or her inborn weaknesses and areas of strength, including hereditary personality type (Pronovost et al., 2016). Being successful understands one’s priorities, acknowledging his or her weaknesses without being afraid to confront them, and striving for balance as well as being open to new opportunities in life.

Based on personality type, every person has his or her own perspective on the particular things that make him or her successful. Most often, many consider their views of success grounded upon another person’s idea of the meaning of success. Nonetheless, among all these concepts of the meaning of success, a central idea is established: that being successful (prosperous) suggests having the ability to understand one’s own important priorities. If a person can spend all his energy and time attempting to fulfill another individual’s idea of success, and belittles or ignores any of his or her opposing views, then he or she will later become exhausted and unhappy. Success rarely occurs until an individual attains such an attitude about happiness. This suggests that it is impossible for one to become successful unless he or she feels happy with his/her accomplishments and goals. Being successful is the capacity to understand the goals which an individual struggles for in life, and setting priorities to enable him or herself to achieve them. Recognizing the most important priorities in one’s life is important for people to achieve personal development.

To become successful, one needs to know his or her weaknesses. Being successful suggests acknowledging our shadows without hiding in them. To attain personal growth, an individual ought to discover his or her individuality and the issue of whether their actions are based on feelings or thinking. A different perspective of success considers that the main denominator of success is having wisdom. With wisdom, one will have the capacity of making good judgments in different situations. Furthermore, the ultimate measure of success should not just be about benefiting ourselves but also the people around us.

To sum up, different people have different perceptions of success. An important aspect that can assist one to become successful is being happy. Therefore, happiness comes before success. If people want to become successful, they should avoid basing their own success on other people’s milestones or accomplishments while belittling their own. Such a state can cause unhappiness. Furthermore, success results from acknowledging one’s own limitations. Ultimately, success derives from having wisdom.